Up The Workers! 1970's Glasgow by Keith Ingham

I really like this one. Really. This is another book from our friends over at Fistful of Books.

Keith Ingham was one of four photographers commissioned by The People's Palace to photograph Calton, an area in the east end of Glasgow, which was about to go through major urban renewal.

Looking at these images shows the very end of a major industrialist era. This was pre-Thatcher Glasgow, when it had a strong a proud industry. Skilled workers and jobs, before everything was closed down. It shows the living and working people of seventies Scotland. And the pride that they had.

Every picture tells its own story and leads well into the next. The people in the images work hard but look happy, perhaps even secure. History now tells us that this would not be the case for much longer, but this brief moment of balance is captured in these images.

This is probably my favourite book of all those featured today, just because of the strength of the images and the impression they left me with.

You can get yourself a copy of this excellent book from Fistful of Books.
